

Pressure is increasing on the Government to increase public health warnings over mobile phones as more fears emerge over their possible risks.

The Department of Health has not updated its advice to consumers for more than four years, while other countries have begun to implement stricter guidance as mobile use has become widespread even among children.

The long-awaited publication of the Interphone final results paper, which will include a public health message, is likely to force a revision of advice even if there is no conclusive proof that mobile phones cause brain cancer.

For full article please go to:-

<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/health/healthnews/6417245/Department-of-Health-under-pressure-to-increase-precautions-over-childrens-mobile-phone-use.html>